Research Interests

Integrated Communication in Marketing and Education

How can marketers effectively use integrated marketing plans and what is their impact? Online media can help engage consumers through increased interactivity with their brand in combination with traditional advertising and public relations. How do we integrate emerging Web 2.0 technologies into a traditional university curriculum? Utilizing new technology with traditional techniques can enable collaborative learning, keep curriculum current and teach tools and resources students will need beyond the classroom.

Dramatic Structure in Advertising

Advertising research has attempted to identify variables in television commercials that influence consumer response. Research has studied variables such as humor, music, sex appeal, testimony, rational messaging, emotional messaging and executional style. Applying Aristotle's and Shakespeare's classic five-act dramatic form to television commercials can be an effective tool for predicting consumer response.

Affirmation Process in Marketing

Consumers use products to affirm and get closer to who they ideally want to be. "Product affirmation" describes this process. If consumers perceive a product as bringing them closer to their ideal selves, product affirmation results in positive changes in a consumer's personality traits such as having more confidence, increasing in happiness and increasing positive word-of-mouth for the product itself.
